VOICE OF THE EDITOR

Equality and the Restroom Line

A reporter I know who covered the accounting profession a quarter century ago once told me she knew the profession was making strides in equality of the sexes when there were enough women representatives to form a line outside the women's restroom during AICPA Council meetings.

I shared my own moment: The time I was assigned to cover a three-day accounting conference. The assigning editor called me to ask why I had seen fit to summarize only male speakers. I told her that I would've summarized the women speakers if there had been any — that's right, not a single woman speaker.

Things have changed since then, but there's still room for improvement. That's why I was so excited to read about the formal programs Rothstein Kass and other firms have put in place to help elevate women CPAs. It's not just about being nice; as the article shows, helping women accountants helps not only the women themselves, but the firms too, and the next generation of accountants.

To say nothing of AICPA Council members and conference speakers.
